THE DAVIS MUSEUM AT WELLESLEY COLLEGE DEBUTS WINDOW COMMISSION PROJECT
WITH SMOKED MY HEAD ON YES WATERS

WELLESLEY, Mass. – The Davis Museum at Wellesley College will debut its inaugural Windows Invitational project with a commission designed by David Teng Olsen, Associate Professor of Art at Wellesley College, titled Smoked my Head on Yes Waters. This is the first of an invitational pilot program designed to engage local artists in transforming the dramatic expanse of floor-to-ceiling ground-level windows that articulates the lobby of the Museum’s signature Rafael Moneo building and its courtyard plaza.

The large-scale vinyl installation, with a design created specifically for this project, is based on elements from several works of art in the Davis permanent collections. With its many striking colors, the piece offers an effect similar to that of stained glass windows. Olsen describes the piece as an “Abstract narrative portrait of my time and experiences at Wellesley College through the filter of my own storytelling.”

In addition to pieces in the Museum’s collection, Olsen also drew inspiration from artists who have recently visited Wellesley College. One example among them is Francis Alÿs, who created a multimedia installation for the Davis Museum in 2011. For the installation, Alÿs took his personal experiences and ideas about his adopted home of Mexico City, and turned them into a complex and multilayered work of art.

The first iteration of the Windows project was organized by Lisa Fischman, the Ruth Gordon Shapiro ’37 Director of the Davis Museum, and will remain in place for one year. The program will be curated by rotation among the Davis curatorial staff. The project is presented with generous support from Wellesley’s Friends of Art at the Davis.
